SUBURBS, SUBURBIA AND SUBURBANIZATION:

A BIBLIOGRAPHY

In 1971, America became a suburban nation. For the first time in our history, and for that matter in the history of any nation, more people lived in suburban areas (36 per cent) than either central cities (29 per cent) or the countryside (35 per cent). Suburbs have been with us since the middle of the last century, although they served primarily as a refuge for the rich well into this one. At least since the end of World War II the suburbanization of the American population has been the nation's major sociological phenomenon. While Harlan Paul Douglas could write in 1925 (The Suburban Trend) "The suburb is a footnote to urban civilization," in the 1970's that relationship seems to be in the process of reversing itself. The dynamics of the suburbanization process, and its effects - "suburbs," "suburbia," "suburbanites" - has induced a prodigious literature by both scholars and journalists. However, these materials have never been assembled in one place. The time has come for the need is here.

In the bibliography which follows we have attempted to provide a comprehensive survey of suburban literature. There is nothing selective about it--source, substance or quality. The original intent was to locate as many references to suburbia, suburbanization and suburban as possible, either published or unpublished, as a basic resource for a series of books on the subject being prepared by the compilers.[1] As we proceeded, however, it became clear the bibliography was becoming the most extensive of its kind and would have some value for students, fellow scholars, research centers, libraries and community action groups. For this reason we chose to offer it to the Council of Planning Librarians as an Exchange Bibliography, where it would reach more people than it would solely as a report of Northwestern University's Center for Urban Affairs.

The bibliography was organized in a way most useful for our basic purposes, using some standard categories - Books, Chapters in Books, Articles in Professional Journals (i.e., academic publications), Articles in Periodicals (i.e., mass circulation publications), Government Publications, Monographs, Unpublished Ph.D.

[1] SUBURBIA: THE NEW AMERICA (Chicago: Quadrangle Books, in press); THE SUBURBANIZATION OF THE CITY (Beverly Hills: Sage Publications, in process); and two others, one an anthology of the most significant work in this bibliography and a theoretical volume on suburbanization.

Dissertations, and Other Unpublished Materials. We had originally intended to include a section entitled Selected Newspaper Articles because of the two excellent series which appeared in the New York Times while we were compiling the bibliography.[2] We found the search task almost impossible and the payoff so low that we abandoned the idea, at least for the time being. The New York Times Index, which incidentally does not include any classification for "suburbs", plus NewsBank, which indexes selectively more than 150 newspapers in over 100 cities, should serve that purpose better than we can.

The entries found in this bibliography include everything we found and thought relevant through September 1971. The sources searched, in addition to our personal files and bookshelves, are as follows:

CUMMULATIVE BOOK INDEX, 1902-September 1971

READERS GUIDE TO PERIODICAL LITERATURE, 1910-September 10, 1971

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS CATALOG, 1950-1971

INDEX TO LEGAL PERIODICALS, passim

CARD CATALOGS OF THE FOLLOWING LIBRARIES: NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, LOYOLA UNIVERSITY, UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA (BERKELEY), THE MUNICIPAL REFERENCE LIBRARY OF THE CITY OF CHICAGO, AND THE CHICAGO PUBLIC LIBRARY

In addition, the bibliographies and footnotes of more than fifteen scholarly books on the suburbs were checked for references.

If there is a major gap it is probably in the legal field. Although we searched the Index to Legal Periodicals, it contains no classification for "suburb(an)" or related topics (e.g., "metropolitan," "urban", "local government"). However, we have included those items found serendipitously.

We feel that this bibliography approaches a comprehensive listing of available work on the suburbs. We also are cognizant of the need for an annotated bibliography on the subject and hope to produce one as a result of our continuing research in this field.

All bibliographic work is time consuming; any attempt to be comprehensive is a prodigious task. We had considerable assistance in this case, which we want to acknowledge with gratitude and appreciation.

Martin A. Finkel and Deborah Ellis Dennis, my two undergraduate assistants, did an outstanding job searching obvious and not so obvious sources, in addition to assisting me in the editorial tasks. John Rothschild helped me considerably in the early stages of the project when its parameters were unknown. Maryann Richardson had the unenviable chore of typing the bibliography and insuring that the potpourri of items we handed her followed a standard format. The efforts of these people are sincerely appreciated but the errors of commission, and more significatnly in a bibliography, of omission, are the responsibility of the compiler-editors.

NOTE: DUE TO THE LARGE NUMBER OF ENTRIES WHICH CAME TO OUR ATTENTION AFTER THE BIBLIOGRAPHY HAD BEEN TYPED AND REPRODUCED, WE HAVE ADDED AN ADDENDUM AT THE END OF THE LAST SECTION. THE ADDENDUM FOLLOWS THE SAME FORMAT AS THE BIBLIOGRAPHY.
